So to be clear: I am not of course demonizing the technical concept of “information”. It was a historically logical decision after the failure of Principia Mathematica. My point is to show the incompleteness of this interactive design reified as a “thing”.

For me, the "information age" was a period of necessary transition, but the real issue now is to understand that we are emerging into "the conscious age", which requires a second-order science integrating observer-actor and representing an extension of classical scientific rationality. I laid some foundations alone, but it can only be an enacted historical collective work.

And why not be un little playful to ease the drama, as I think that the failure of this collective endeavor could potentially lead to much suffering, maybe elsewhere, out of view of our little-bourgeois visibility:
