[ The Advantage of the 1P Disciplined Perspective ]

The first-person phenomenological perspective has a great advantage over the classical 3P-Only/Cartesianist scientific point of view: being able to also study its intentional object through **negation**.

Where behaviorist science is condemned to accumulate occurrences to infinity in order to generalize them, a phenomenologist can also simply study a psychological/cognitive phenomenon **directly** through its voluntary repression.

Do one want to understand the role of language? Stop talking. That of physical movement? Stop moving. That of the intellectual mind? Stop thinking. One will learn as much from it as by observing these phenomena from the outside in a positive way.

You may answer me that classical science also studies the pathologies and traumas generating these absences, but that would be to misinterpret the complementary nature of the knowledge I am talking about.

It is sometimes in the absence that we understand the presence.
