[Doing Science & Con-sciousness]

'Science', seen as a socio-techno-philosophical striving towards a collective truth value, or more precisely as the collective normativity enacted by the activities of 'scientists', is now under high pressure: enshrined in 'post-truth secular and an atmosphere conducive to polarization, subject to increasingly intensive productivist policies that it itself has historically engendered, disrupted by emerging psychotechnologies, undermined by private and strategic financial interests and lobbies, immersed in a complexity growing and weak epistemological guides, in the face of its own historical "ontological saturation"... Of course you will tell me, like everyone else and they are (well) paid for that. But beyond these trivialities, how is it possible today in this context to still do "Science"?
